

Critical Tourism Studies Proceedings

Volume 2017

Article 81

2017

Victim Blaming Doesn't Take a Holiday

Heather Jeffrey

University of Bedfordshire, h.l.jeffrey@mdx.ac.uk

Paola Vizcaino

Universidad Autónoma del Estado de México, paola.vizcaino.suarez@gmail.com

Follow this and additional works at: <https://digitalcommons.library.tru.ca/cts-proceedings>

Part of the Tourism and Travel Commons

Recommended Citation

Jeffrey, Heather and Vizcaino, Paola (2017) "Victim Blaming Doesn't Take a Holiday," Critical Tourism Studies Proceedings: Vol. 2017 , Article 81.

Available at: <https://digitalcommons.library.tru.ca/cts-proceedings/vol2017/iss1/81>

This Abstract is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @ TRU Library. It has been accepted for inclusion in Critical Tourism Studies Proceedings by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @ TRU Library. For more information, please contact apaterson@tru.ca.

Title: Victim Blaming Doesn't Take a Holiday

Author: Heather L. Jeffrey¹ & Paola Vizcaino Suárez²

Affiliation: University of Bedfordshire¹, Universidad Autónoma del Estado de México²

Contact: paola.vizcaino.suarez@gmail.com

Session Type: Presentation

Abstract:

Gender is socially constructed, shaped by gender discourses that permeate society, and is performed every day in every interaction. At the intersection between contemporary feminist theories and postmodern currents, in particular poststructuralism, it is recognized that gender identities are not static but are (re)constructed from social and political discourses. The critical analysis of discourse is concerned precisely with the reproduction of social domination through discourse. Discourse is an important vehicle for defining socially accepted activities for both women and men, including activities related to leisure, tourism, and travel. In the Latin American context, violence against women is normalized by adherence to a patriarchal system that seeks to blame victims without taking into account the role of abusers. The field of travel and tourism is not immune to this trend, since female victims of violence are often held responsible for their victimization or even femicide.

Whilst a small stream of research has analysed female tourists in the English speaking world, less research has focussed on tourists from Other countries. A paucity of conceptualisations concerning Other female tourists can unwittingly reify the binary constructions of hosts and guests. This paper attempts to address these concerns by exploring and opening debate on gender-based violence and the normalisation of victim blaming, in the context of travel and tourism. A critical discourse analysis investigates user generated comments on online news that reported the case of two Argentine tourists, Marina Menegazzo and María José Coni, who were murdered during a trip to Ecuador in 2016. The Internet offers a space for participants from around the world to (re)construct narratives and discourses, while providing an important source of data for researchers, and it can be a space of misogyny and sexism with the potential to perpetuate and even intensify existing gender inequalities.